

Singapore luxury home sales soar to new high

When the circuit-breaker measures were relaxed, sales of watches and jewellery turned the corner; the index sustained an uptrend starting June 2020 to approach 90 in March 2021, though it did not exceed 2019's pre-pandemic levels.

Meanwhile, sales volumes of high-end homes in the first 9 months of 2021 have already outdone historic yearly highs, based on IREUS' analysis of caveats data from the Realis platform.

Lee Nai Jia, IREUS deputy director, said purchases of luxury housing grew more quickly than other discretionary spending because the former may be better able to "preserve value in the face of uncertainty and rising inflation".

In January to September this year, 279 units changed hands for over S$10 million, roughly two-thirds more than the 170 sold in the whole of 2019. The latest nine-month volume was also higher than the full-year peaks of 275 units in 2007 and 267 in 2010.

This pick-up in luxury home sales followed last year's dip in activity at the height of the pandemic amid the circuit-breaker measures, similar to the watches and jewellery sales index. In 2020, there were 150 residential units purchased at more than S$10 million, 20 units fewer than in 2019, Realis data showed.

Most of the high-end residences – 246 units or 88.2 per cent – were purchased through the resale market in January to September 2021, while only 33 were new sales.

Detached houses made up the bulk of luxury home transactions in the first 9 months this year, accounting for 176 units or 63.1 per cent of total deals. Of these, 76 homes were located in the Bukit Timah planning area, and 21 were in the Tanglin planning area.

As for non-landed units priced above S$10 million, the Orchard Road area topped the list with 19 units there changing hands.

Dr Lee said: "Despite the slower economic growth and heightened uncertainty, more people are buying discretionary and luxury items, including real estate."

While the initial spike in sales was likely due to pent-up demand after Covid-19 restrictions were lifted, the sustained growth in sales volumes suggests other drivers are also at play.

One factor was the creation of new wealth during the pandemic. "Individuals who benefitted from the sharp increase in stock prices and alternative assets, such as cryptocurrencies, spent more," Dr Lee pointed out.

CBRE's head of research for South-east Asia, Tricia Song, said the landed market, particularly Good Class Bungalows, has been boosted by fresh demand from digital economy entrepreneurs and key executives, as well as continued demand from new citizens.

"The non-landed luxury market has been boosted by locals as well as some foreigners who see Singapore as a safe haven to deploy ample liquidity amid low interest rates," she added.

List Sotheby's International Realty research director Han Huan Mei has observed work-from-home arrangements and lifestyle changes fuelling demand for luxury homes, as bigger living spaces have become necessary for the well-heeled. In addition, the number of affluent individuals has increased. "Real estate assets are now considered as part of the tangible wealth held by these ultra-high-net-worth investors," Han noted.

Dr Lee also said that part of the old wealth accumulated by the baby-boomer generation could be transferred to millennials, enabling the latter to make pricier purchases.

He expects buyer interest in posh homes to grow, although there may be fewer such properties on the market. "Hence, sales volumes will likely decline in 2022, but prices could increase due to scarcity," he added.

Knight Frank Singapore's research head Leonard Tay said in October that limited inventory and pent-up demand from wealthy foreigners were supporting prices of large luxury homes in prime areas. Tay also noted early signs that Singapore's attractiveness to foreign and local wealth was "beginning to translate into increased activity, supporting prices".

CBRE's Song foresees activity in the landed market slowing down into 2022, "as available stock dwindles and prices hit resistance". On the other hand, the non-landed market could benefit from the reopening of borders and the return of foreign demand, leading to more buoyant volumes. "Overall, we expect further price appreciation in the luxury segment next year," she said.

Meanwhile, Han expects "a gradual rise in foreign investors who value Singapore's way of handling the pandemic, as well as the high-quality healthcare system".
