My grandpa’s heart attack taught me a doctor’s care goes beyond the patient

Faye Nyu G1

In medical school, where I am a first-year student, a large part of our training centers on patient communication. As part of our final year practicum, we simulate interactions with patients and family members to handle emotionally charged situations. Cases include feuding families, patients with terminal diagnoses, and relatives who struggle to handle medical conditions.

Despite my years of medical training, I was unprepared when I lost my grandfather. He was the greatest role model and an inspiration to his family, which included my mother and her four siblings. Many family members were devastated and confused.

When I finally learned the tragic news, I was in a hospital ward. I was immediately devastated, and I knew I had to act quickly. My mother and I immediately went to the hospital to see my grandfather. I was sitting next to him when my mother called me over.

I was in shock. My mother said, “Grandpa is going to be okay.” I looked over his bed, and I could see that my grandfather was improving. The doctors and nurses were all around my grandfather, and he was doing much better.

I was grateful for my family’s support and the doctors’ expertise. They did their best to explain the situation to us. I wanted to be there for my mother when she was dealing with the stress and confusion. It made a difference when the doctor took the time to talk to us.

I wanted to be there for my mother, and I wanted to support her in any way that I could. My mother needed my help, and I knew that I had to step up.

I am grateful to the medical team for their care. I am proud of the way they handled my grandfather’s situation. They were professional and caring.

Reflecting on my interactions with the medical team, I made a difference when the doctor over the phone asked if I had any further questions. I felt better when she reassured me and encouraged me to turn to someone below me for help.

In conclusion, I am grateful to the medical team for their care. I am proud of the way they handled my grandfather’s situation. They were professional and caring. I am grateful to the medical team for their care. I am proud of the way they handled my grandfather’s situation.